PART I – OVERVIEW AND STATEMENT OF FACTS

1. The decision under review at the Federal Court of Appeal was whether the Appellant should be found inadmissible pursuant to s. 36(1)(a) of the Immigration and Refugee Protection Act ("IRPA"). The Court held that the phrase "punishable by a maximum term of imprisonment of at least 10 years" in s. 36(1)(a) of IRPA can reasonably be interpreted as the maximum term of imprisonment under the law in force at the time admissibility is determined. The BCCLA argues that this interpretation of the statute is inconsistent with s. 11(i) of the Charter of Rights and Freedoms ("Charter") and violates the presumption against retroactive punishment.

2. BCCLA takes no position as to the facts in this matter.

PART II – POINTS IN ISSUE

3. The BCCLA is intervening in this Appeal with respect to the following issue: whether the phrase "punishable by a maximum term of imprisonment of at least 10 years" in s. 36(1)(a) of the IRPA refers to the maximum term of imprisonment available at the time the person was sentenced or the maximum term of imprisonment under the law at the time admissibility is determined.

4. Section 36 (1)(a) of the IRPA states as follows:

> 36. (1) A permanent resident or a foreign national is inadmissible on grounds of serious criminality for
> (a) having been convicted in Canada of an offence under an Act of Parliament punishable by a maximum term of imprisonment of at least 10 years, or of an offence under an Act of Parliament for which a term of imprisonment of more than six months has been imposed;

PART III – STATEMENT OF ARGUMENT

5. The BCCLA submits that Mr. Tran should be subject to the legal consequences in accordance with the law that was in force at the time he was convicted. As this Court has recently stated,"(p)eople's conduct and the legal consequences that flow from it should be judged on the basis of the law in force at the time and secondly because the general presumption against retroactive punishment requires this result. This is a basic tenet of our legal system."[1]

6. This submission is based on three distinct arguments: (1) an inadmissibility determination resulting in deportability is a "penal consequence", thereby triggering the protection contained in section 11(i) of the Charter against the retroactive interpretation of section 36(1)(a) of IRPA; (2) rule of law mandates the presumption against retroactivity; and

[1] R v KRJ [2016] SCJ No 31 [KRJ] at para 1. [BCCLA, Book of Authorites "B.A.", TAB 12]

(3) international jurisprudence supports the application of the presumption against retroactivity.

A. Inadmissibility Determinations and Deportation are "penal consequences"

7. Section 11 of the Charter provides robust protection against the retroactive interpretation of s.36(1)(a) of IRPA. Section 11(i) of the Charter states that any person charged with an offence has the right, if found guilty of the offence, and if the punishment for the offence has been varied between the time of commission and the time of sentencing, to receive the benefit of the lesser punishment. That section states:

> Any person charged with an offence has the right ...
> (i) if found guilty of the offence and if the punishment for the offence has been varied between the time of commission and the time of sentencing, to the benefit of the lesser punishment;

8. To attract the protection of s. 11(i) of the Charter, the measure at issue must qualify as punishment or a penal consequence. The BCCLA submits that deportation arising from an inadmissibility determination under s. 36(1)(a) of the IRPA is indeed "punishment" that attracts the protection of s. 11(i) of the Charter.

9. In Wigglesworth, the Supreme Court determined that the protection awarded by section 11 of the Charter is restricted to "criminal or quasi-criminal proceedings and proceedings giving rise to penal consequences."[2]

10. In the 1989 decision of Hurd[3], the Federal Court of Canada interpreted R. v. Wigglesworth and held that deportation was not a "true penal consequence". However, the BCCLA submits that Hurd v. Canada has been overtaken by developments in the jurisprudence, and, in particular, the decision of this Court in K.R.J[4].

11. Deportation is properly characterized in the present instance as a "true penal consequence". In K.R.J. the Court created a new test, which should be applied to the criminal context. Application of this new test to the present context is aligned with both the "liberal and purposive" interpretation warranted by the Charter as well the recent U.S. and U.K. jurisprudence on this point.

12. Although K.R.J. was determined in the context of criminal proceedings, the Court is clear that the test applies to proceedings outside the criminal context as well, noting that the Court has always looked to effects as well as purposes when considering the constitutionality of laws.[5] Whether deportation resulting from an inadmissibility determination is a punishment or true penal consequence, such that s. 11 of the Charter applies, therefore falls to be determined by the K.R.J. test. The test is as follows:

> A measure constitutes punishment if:
> (1) it is a consequence of conviction that forms part of the arsenal of sanctions to which an accused may be liable in respect of a particular offence, and either
> (2) it is imposed in furtherance of the purpose and principles of sentencing, or
> (3) it has a significant impact on an offender's liberty or security interests.[6]

13. The BCCLA submits that deportation resulting from an inadmissibility determination is a true penal consequence and satisfies the K.R.J. test.[7].

Deportation is a consequence of conviction

14. Deportation arising from an admissibility determination pursuant to s. 36(1)(a) of IRPA is a consequence of conviction that forms part of the arsenal of sanctions to which an accused may be liable in respect of a particular offence. Deportability following an inadmissible determination is clearly a consequence of an individual's conviction, pursuant to the wording of s. 36(1)(a) of IRPA.

15. The Oxford Dictionary defines consequence as "a result or effect".[8] In the present case, but-for being convicted of a "serious offence", the person concerned would not be deportable due to an inadmissibility determination.[9]

16. Deportations arising from an inadmissibility determination are indeed part of the "arsenal of sanctions" to which an accused may be subject. The recent decision of this Court in R. v. Pham affirmed R. v. Hamilton,[10] and found that "(t)he risk of deportation can be a factor to be taken into consideration in choosing among the appropriate sentencing responses and tailoring the sentence to best fit the crime and the offender".[11]

17. The decision in R. v. Pham permits the immigration consequences of sentencing to be taken into account, within a range. The implication of the ruling in R. v. Pham is that the Court can consider deportation consequences of criminality when determining upon a sentence precisely because these consequences are part of the arsenal of sanctions to which the accused is subject.

Purpose and principles of sentencing

18. The second component of the K.R.J. test is also satisfied. Namely, a deportation order issued pursuant to s. 36(1) of the IRPA is, in part, imposed in furtherance of the purpose and principles of sentencing. Section 718 of the Criminal Code sets out, inter alia, the following principles of sentencing:

> Purpose
> 718. The fundamental purpose of sentencing is to contribute, along with crime prevention initiatives, to respect for the law and the maintenance of a just, peaceful and safe society by imposing just sanctions that have one or more of the following objectives:
> (a) to denounce unlawful conduct;
> (c) to separate offenders from society, where necessary;

19. In the present case, the Minister states that the goal of s. 36(1)(a) of IRPA is to uphold the public policy purpose of prioritizing security, which in fact, falls under the objective of "separating offender from society, where necessary" under s. 718(c) of the Code.[12] It is further of note that in K.R.J., this Court held that "sanctions intended to advance public safety do not constitute a broad exception to the protection s. 11(i) of the Charter affords and may indeed qualify as punishment."[13] While the Court also said that a public protection purpose is not, on its own, determinative, it went on to say that "the purpose of sentencing is to 'protect society' or advance 'respect for the law and the maintenance of a just, peaceful and safe society' (s. 718 of the Criminal Code) by fulfilling one or more of the traditional sentencing objectives (s. 718(a) through (f) in accordance with the principles of sentencing reflected in ss. 718.1 and 718.2."[14]

[12] Respondent's memorandum at 15, para 49.

Further, at para 34: The Court held: To be clear, while measures imposed at sentencing for the purpose of protecting the public may constitute punishment under s. 11(i), a public-protection purpose is not, on its own, determinative. To satisfy the second branch of the Rodgers test, a consequence of conviction must be imposed in furtherance of the purpose and principles of sentencing. As discussed, the purpose of sentencing is to "protect society" or advance "respect for the law and the maintenance of a just, peaceful and safe society" (s 718 of the Criminal Code) by fulfilling one or more of the traditional sentencing objectives (s 718(a) through (f)) in accordance with the principles of sentencing reflected in ss 718.1 and 718.2. [BCCLA, B.A., TAB 12]
[14] K.R.J. at para. 34. [BCCLA, B.A., TAB 12]

Significant impact on liberty and security interests

20. The right to liberty is defined expansively in the jurisprudence. It encompasses freedom from physical restraint and "the right to make fundamental personal choices free from state interference".[15]

21. As for security of the person, this Court recently stated that "(s)ecurity of the person encompasses 'a notion of personal autonomy involving... control over one's bodily integrity free from state interference' [...] and it is engaged by state interference with an individual's physical or psychological integrity, including any state action that causes physical or serious psychological suffering".[16]

22. In the context of the present case, Mr. Tran stands to be deported from Canada pursuant to a finding of inadmissibility under s. 36(1)(a) of IRPA; this clearly impacts his liberty and security interests.

Additional considerations

23. That a deportation pursuant to s. 36(1)(a) of the IRPA falls within the protection of s. 11(i) of the Charter pursuant to the K.R.J test is also warranted by "the liberal and purposive approach" this Court has mandated in interpreting Charter rights, including s. 11.[17]

24. Moreover, the Federal Court of Appeal's finding that deportation is not a "penal consequence" runs contrary to recent jurisprudence of the United States and the United Kingdom.

25. In its 2010 Padilla decision, the United States Supreme Court ("USSC") retreated from the rigid criminal-civil dichotomy and recognized that deportation can have penal consequences. The law, the USSC explained, has "enmeshed criminal convictions and the penalty of deportation."[18]

26. At issue in Padilla was the question of whether a lawyer is constitutionally obliged to warn her client about the immigration consequences of a guilty plea. The traditional rule had been that lawyers must warn about the direct (criminal) consequences of a plea, but not regarding the indirect ones (usually civil). While lower courts had been of the view that the civil character of deportation placed it outside of the Sixth Amendment's scope, a majority led by Justice Stevens disagreed. Noting that deportation "is not, in a strict sense, a criminal sanction", the majority explained that "deportation is nevertheless intimately related to the criminal process [;] and "we find it 'most difficult' to divorce the penalty from the conviction in the deportation context."[19] Accordingly, the Court found that the Sixth Amendment mandates that defense counsel must warn a client of the possible immigration consequences of a guilty plea.[20]

27. Similarly, there is some recent shift in the U.K. jurisprudence which characterizes deportation pursuant to criminality as "penal". Lord Justice Wilson of the Court of Appeal, in deciding whether to deport a convicted criminal, cast deportation as "penal" by holding that it, in part, responds to the need to deter foreign nationals "from committing serious crimes by leading them to understand that, whatever the other circumstances, one consequence of them may well be deportation." According to the Court of Appeal's decision, the characterization of deportation cannot be regarded as anything but "penal".[21]

B. Rule of Law Mandates the Presumption Against Retroactivity

28. Interpreting s. 36(1)(a) of IRPA retroactively is contrary to the principle of rule of law.

29. In the present case, Mr. Tran stands to be deported. This potential for a high level of unfairness, in the absence of express statutory language ousting the principle against retrospective application, is concerning. There is nothing in s. 36(1)(a) of the IRPA that expressly oust the presumption against retroactivity.

30. This Court in K.R.J., in the context of section 11 of the Charter, albeit within the criminal law context, affirmed the following words of Lord Diplock: "acceptance of the rule of law as a constitutional principle requires that a citizen, before committing himself to any course of action, should be able to know in advance what are the legal consequences that will flow from it".[22]

31. It is strongly presumed that legislation is not intended to be applicable to facts that were already in the past when the legislation came into force.[23] As Professor Sullivan states, "(i)n order to comply with the law or rely on it in a useful way, a person must know what the law is prior to acting… the retroactive application of legislation makes it impossible for the law to be known in advance of acting: the content of the law becomes known only when it is too late to do anything about it. In effect, the law is deemed to have been different from what it actually was. The principle has been upheld by Canadian Courts, as exhibited by the deision in Mackenzie v British Columbia (Commissioner of Teachers' Pensions).[24]

32. As expressed by Professor John Gardner, in accordance with the principle of the rule of law, the law must be such that those subject to it can reliably be guided by it, either to avoid violating it or to build the legal consequences of having violated it into their thinking about what future actions may be open to them. People must be able to find out what the law is and to factor it into their practical deliberations. The law must avoid taking people by surprise, ambushing them, putting them into conflict with its requirements in such a way as to defeat their expectations and frustrate their plans.[25]

33. Professor Lon Fuller enunciated similar concerns in his seminal work, The Morality of Law, wherein he stated that retrospective laws threaten the rule of law in another way, by undercutting the integrity of laws currently in effect, "since it puts them under the threat of retrospective change".[26] The Supreme Court of Canada adopted professor Fuller's concern in K.R.J.[27]

34. In the context of s. 36(1)(a) of the IRPA, the presumption against retroactivity is mandated by the rule of law. Mr. Tran was convicted in 2012, and at the applicable time, he would not have been rendered deportable. The IRPA has not changed from 2012 to now. Mr. Tran should not, by virtue of a new criminal law under which he could not be convicted presently, be deportable due to a change in the Criminal Code. Indeed, such a consequence takes him by surprise and violates the firmly established principle of the rule of law as laid out by this Honourable Court in K.R.J.

C. International Jurisprudence and the Presumption Against Retroactivity

35. The presumption against retroactivity also applies in the present case in light of the principle of non-retroactivity applied in the immigration context by other jurisdictions.

36. The USSC has rejected the retroactive imposition of penalties in the immigration context.[28] In Landgraf v USI Film Products, the Court adopted Justice Story's reasoning from Wheeler which held that a statute may be considered retroactive even if it does not purport to take effect at a time earlier than its date of passage.[29] According to Justice Story, statues that takes effect at the date of passage, but nevertheless impair an individual's vested rights can also be said to be retroactive in nature. The USSC held:

> every statute, which takes away or impairs vested rights acquired under existing laws, or creates a new obligation, imposes a new duty, or attaches a new disability, in respect to transactions or considerations already past, must be deemed retrospective."[30]

37. In Landgraf, the USSC confirmed that there exists a strong presumption against interpreting laws in a way that produces a retroactive effect. The Court noted that, although there is no absolute bar against a retroactive law, assuming that it does not trigger constitutional protections, it will not apply a statute retroactively unless the legislature has made clear its intention that this is its desired effect. This requirement "helps to ensure that Congress itself has determined that the benefits of retroactivity outweigh the potential for disruption or unfairness."[31] The rationale for this strong presumption, which is "deeply rooted in American jurisprudence," is grounded in fundamental fairness: "individuals should have an opportunity to know what the law is and to conform their conduct accordingly; settled expectations should not be lightly disrupted."[21] Accordingly, in Landgraf the USSC articulated a two-part test for the determination of whether a statute should be construed as applying retroactively.

> 1. First, the court must "ascertain whether Congress has directed with the requisite clarity that the law be applied retrospectively."
> 2. Second, the court must determine whether applying the legislation would actually result in an impermissible retroactive effect.[32]

38. The USSC applied this test to the deportation context in St. Cyr[33], the facts of which are similar to the facts of the present case. St. Cyr concerned the question of whether legislation retroactively removed the Attorney General's statutory authority to issue a waiver of deportation to an individual convicted of a felony. Mr. St. Cyr, a US permanent resident, plead guilty to the possession of a controlled substance in March 1996. At the time of his plea, the law authorized the Attorney General to issue a discretionary waiver of deportation. However, the Attorney General refused to issue such a waiver on the grounds that subsequent legislation removed the waiver discretion that would have been available to Mr. St. Cyr at the time of his plea.

39. The USSC held that the subsequent legislation is inapplicable in the case of a permanent resident who has entered into a plea agreement that would have rendered him eligible for a discretionary waiver at the time the agreement was concluded.[34]

40. In applying the first prong, the USSC stated that there is a high threshold for finding that the legislature clearly intended retroactivity. The Court outlined the following:

- The standard for finding such unambiguous direction is a demanding one. '[C]ases where this Court has found truly 'retroactive' effect adequately authorized by statute have involved statutory language that was so clear that it could sustain only one interpretation.'[35]
- With respect to deportation legislation, there is an established principle that any lingering statutory ambiguity should be decided in favor of the individual who risks being deported.[36]

41. In applying the second prong of the test, the USSC held an individual's vulnerability to deportation cannot be said to be purely prospective in nature; while it does affect his ability to remain in the country going into the future, it is also retrospective in that a permanent resident may reasonably rely on the possibility of a discretionary waiver that was legally available to him at the time he made a plea.[37]

42. Justice Ginsburg of the USSC applied these principles in Vartleas v. Holder.[38] She applied the presumption against retroactivity to a law intended to bar immigrants from re-entry into the US, if they had in the past committed a crime of "moral turpitude". At issue in Vartleas was whether this law could bar a legal resident from re-entry into the US after brief trip abroad when the legal standard that was in place at the time the individual was convicted permitted brief trips abroad without a bar to re-entry. Citing Landgraf and St. Cyr, Justice Ginsburg found that if the new law were applied to Vartelas, if would lead to unfair retroactive results by creating a new "disability".[39]

> Vartelas presents a firm case for application of the antiretroactivity principle. Neither his sentence, nor the immigration law in effect when he was convicted and sentenced, blocked him from occasional visits to his parents in Greece.

> Current §1101(a)(13)(C)(v), if applied to him, would thus attach "a new disability" to conduct over and done well before the provision's enactment.[40]

43. Similarly, applying s. 36(1)(a) of the IRPA to Mr. Tran would subject him to new impediments which were in fact not in place at the time he was sentenced and convicted. There is no express language ousting the presumption of retroactivity in the present case.

44. The U.K. jurisprudence also militates against the retroactive interpretation of s. 36(1)(a) of IRPA. In the recent case of R (Miller) v. Secretary of State, a three-judge panel of the High Court of Justice, Queen's Bench Division, unanimously summarized how courts apply constitutional principles to the process of statutory interpretation.[41] The Court held that a rule against retroactivity is an example of a particularly strong constitutional principle.

> There is a strong presumption against Parliament being taken to have intended to give a statute retrospective effect, even if the language used in the statue might appear to create such effect.[42]

45. As Lord Nicholls explained in Wilson, this presumption against retroactivity is connected to the notice of fairness:

> This was well identified by Staughton LJ in Secretary of State for Social Security v Tunnicliffe, [1991] 2 All ER 712 at 724: The true principle is that Parliament is presumed not to have intended to alter the law applicable to past events and transactions in a manner which is unfair to those concerned in them, unless a contrary intention appears. It is not simply a question of classifying an enactment as retrospective or not retrospective. Rather it may well be a matter of degree - the greater the unfairness, the more it is to be expected that Parliament will make it clear if that is intended.'[43]

PART IV – STATEMENT ON COSTS

46. BCCLA seeks no costs and respectfully ask that no costs are awarded against them.

PART V – ORDER SOUGHT

47. BCCLA seeks leave to present oral argument before the Court based on these submissions.

All of which is respectfully submitted this 21st day of November 2016, at Toronto.
